Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a new and improved method and apparatus for mounting a rotor in a stator of a rotary electric machine. 2. Description of the Related Art In the past, two well known methods for mounting a rotor of a rotary electric machine in a stator of the rotary electric machine were set forth in U.S. Pat. No. 3,877,548 to Raymond V. Pierpont et al. and U.S. Pat. No. 3,611,979 to Franklin E. Rastall. In the method disclosed in the patent to Pierpont, et al., the air gap between the rotor and the stator of the rotary electric machine is filled with a liquid dielectric to permit relative movement between the rotor and the stator during the operation of the rotary electric machine. In the method of Rastall, the rotor is mounted in the stator of the rotary electric machine by a circular projection on the rotor that is received in a circumferentially inwardly directed undercut in the stator. However, the use of dielectric material to fill the air gap in the rotary electric machine during operation of the rotary electric machine introduces a new potential problem. If the dielectric material should leak from the air gap, a spark can occur between the rotor and the stator. The use of the dielectric material also increases the weight of the rotary electric machine. In the method of Rastall, the rotor is mounted in the stator by a plurality of radially extending resilient fingers having projections or

The most exciting Windows 10 feature yet: Live Tiles. But it won't appear by itself; the keyboard shortcut is "Windows Key + M". There's an easy way to change that, however: You can assign a different shortcut to a Live Tile that appears on your Start Menu. This can be done for any tile -- even those you've already created. It's a very simple process, so I'll walk you through the steps so you can begin using Live Tiles immediately.
