In an interview with the UK's Daily Telegraph, Klaus Franz said that he was "very convinced" that a production version of the auto-driving car would be ready by 2022, the year that a number of traditional automakers plan to introduce autonomous vehicles. Franz said he was "very sure that in 2021 we will have the first self-driving car on the roads." Porsche has been pushing for a autonomous car platform for a while. In May, CEO Oliver Blume told reporters that the automaker had been working on the technology for a number of years. "It's now time to develop this technology on the mass market," he said. Blume has previously said that a self-driving car might not be ready in five years, but later estimated that it would be ready in about seven. In the interview, Franz said that he had been frustrated by how long it has taken for the auto industry to embrace self-driving cars, and that now Porsche was ready to take the technology mainstream. "A huge demand for a self-driving car does exist," he said. "People want it. It makes sense." The CEO added that he hoped the car would cost around $100,000 to $150,000. He said that the company is "looking for a 'grandma market,' for the people with the most common means who want to take their car for a spin every now and then." He didn't say when the vehicle would come out, but he did say it would be introduced in the "US and probably also in China." Porsche doesn't plan to develop self-driving cars as an independent company, but instead as part of a platform. In addition to Porsche, the vehicle could f988f36e3a
