A nice new way to support the community-operated Raspberry Pi project would be to buy an official Pi kit. It's compact and light and has a clear display that shows what you're doing. Here is one that includes a keyboard. It's £9.95 and the description says it is good for the learning of "key-based input methods." If that's really true, then it's a very good deal. They're available in the UK at costs starting around $16.95 but a US site at Amazon sells a similar product for about $50. I'll be watching for the next available order. Another choice is the little handheld Raspberry Pi that looks like an iPad. This has a touch screen and Raspberry Pi included. I suspect it will appeal to the more serious students and professionals. The original price is $180 but it's been available in the UK since the middle of last month. The future availability of that will depend, of course, on whether they are shipped to the UK. Another option, if you prefer an all-in-one solution, is to get a Pi

Starter Kit from the [official website]. The one I have just ordered will arrive in mid-May and it includes a 3G modem, a power supply and SD cards. The price is $64.95. That's really a bargain. I looked at some of the open source software alternatives, but eventually decided on using a game called SpaceRace. You can see a video of the demo here. It's not a perfect demonstration because of the limited screen resolution of my notional Raspberry Pi, but it should make clear what it's capable of and how well it works. A copy of the game is available for download from [sourceforge.net] - just click on the button beneath the SpaceRace header. For those who want to learn more, the
